PREFACE

FROM a letter written by my wife in the first year of our marriage 48 years ago and recently come to light it appears that she was already engaged in arranging the first collection of slips containing entries for the projected comparative dictionary of Indo-aryan. Throughout all our life together she has continued with a task which has culminated in the compilation of this volume. In it she has listed all the 140,000 words quoted in the Dictionary for purposes of comparison and has arranged them in their several languages or language-groups.

The order of the New Indo-aryan languages in the indexes is on the geographical basis described in the Introduction to the Dictionary. This does not always correspond with their dialectal grouping: thus the Gypsy languages and Ḍumāki are separated by the Kafiri and Dardic languages from those of the Centre with which they are ultimately more nearly related. Where words from two or more dialects are included under one language heading, as for example the numerous dialects collected under West Pahārī, their order follows the same principle, with the exception of the Pashai dialects. These are set out alphabetically, their geographical distribution being shown in the map opposite p. 1 of Morgenstierne's Indo-Iranian Frontier Languages, iii. 1.

I regret that a further long list of corrigenda in the Dictionary must be added to this volume. Any further addenda assembled during the remainder of my life and unpublished at its end will be deposited in the Library of the School of Oriental and African Studies.

As I lay down my pen on this my eightieth birthday, I reflect with humility that it has been granted to me to complete, however imperfectly, a project conceived fifty years ago; and I am filled with a deep sense of gratitude to all those whose names I set down in the Preface to the Dictionary as my helpers, but above all to her whose love has supported me through all these years and who has herself been the principal agent in compiling this volume.

KAFIRI and
(including Kashmiri)
The alphabetic order is that used by Grierson in Kashmiri Dictionary and by Morgenstierne in Etymological Dictionary of Pashto, Indo-Iranian Frontier Languages, and vocabularies of Kafir and Dardic languages; words are arranged in the order of the consonants of the roman alphabet, no account being taken of vowels except that (1) all words beginning with a vowel are arranged together at the beginning; (2) words with the same consonants are arranged according to the order of their vowels. Modifications of roman letters follow their simple form (thus a ā ä ä etc., č č etc., n n etc., t t etc.); aspirates count as a single consonant and follow the unaspirated form (thus k kh, t th etc.); there is no distinction between v and w.
